Project Overview

Stardust Ranch is an experiential retreat in Fayetteville, Texas, created for the design and building community to gather, connect, and recharge. Part living showroom, part sanctuary, it hosts interior designers, builders, and architects from Houston, Austin, Dallas, San Antonio, and beyond for overnight stays, curated gatherings, and events.

Wellness isn't an amenity at Stardust Ranch — it's the property's fundamental reason for being. Designer Jessica Love partnered with Thermasol to incorporate steam and shower systems that carry personal restoration through every layer of the property, from the primary suite to the outdoor bath house.

The Challenge

Interior designer Jessica Love built Stardust Ranch around a simple belief: our surroundings shape how we live, feel, and connect. The ranch serves a specific audience — designers, builders, and architects who spend their careers creating spaces for other people. Love's goal was to give them a place to experience wellness all their own.

A heat session had to leave an impression strong enough for guests to carry home, into the work they do for their own clients. That ruled out anything that read as spa treatment — the steam partner had to be reliable enough to trust and refined enough to disappear into the design.

The Thermasol Solution

Thermasol supplied the steam and sensory systems; Jessica built them into a seamless ritual. A ThermaTouch control governs the whole experience from one interface. The SteamVection steamhead disperses steam evenly, with no hot spots, while the HydroVive rainhead unifies light, sound, and water into one ceiling element.

Behind the wall, a Pro Series III generator sits up to 50 feet from the shower, and the Digital Shower Valve conceals in a wall cavity — keeping the wet area free of hardware so the design stays quiet and uncluttered.

Thermasol was chosen for reliability and reputation, but also for proximity: the company is headquartered less than three hours away. For a property built to celebrate Texas design and craftsmanship, partnering with a Texas-based wellness manufacturer was a natural fit.

Design Integration

With the technology settled, Jessica designed around it for every sense, not just sight. Heated floors ground the primary bathroom. Amethyst cathedral crystals, set into the shower stone, echo Stardust's Round Top roots. Scent, texture, and the quiet of the surrounding countryside all do quiet work alongside the plumbing.

The steam shower in the main house became a daily ritual — a few minutes of enveloping heat before the day starts. Outdoors, a sauna from Almost Heaven Saunas (a sibling brand to Thermasol) sits in the open field near the hot tub and cold plunge, so the walk to and from it becomes part of the experience; guests move between heat, cold, and rest at their own pace. Even the soaking tubs carry the theme forward, using a microjet system that folds millions of warm air bubbles into the water — a quieter, more subtle massage than a traditional jetted tub.

None of it works in isolation. The rhythm between rooms is the point: guests move from steam to plunge to soak, creating their own journey of restoration.

Results & Experience

The finished spaces feel like a held breath: cool stone underfoot, limewashed plaster, soft light, and the quiet of the Texas countryside beyond the window. Steam has become part of the daily rhythm at the ranch — a slow morning, a moment of decompression before the day begins.

For the designers, builders, and architects who stay at Stardust Ranch, the hope is simple: that they leave rested and inspired, and carry a little of that wellness back into the spaces they build for others.

Stardust Ranch was created as a place where the design community can come to rest, reconnect, and be inspired. Integrating wellness experiences like steam and sauna helps create that pause, allowing guests to reset and carry that inspiration back into the spaces they create for others.
